In 1974, Mrs. Marion Kaplan, a British National Geographic photographer, made a journey from the Persian Gulf to Africa with a traditional Iranian sailing ship for reporting on the oldest maritime trade route. On this trip she spent four months with the latest generation of Iranian sailors. Forty years later Mrs. Kaplan comes to the south of Iran to find and meet again with her previous fellow travelers. But the visit is not what she expected it to be. The Iranian and Arab traditional sailing ships were destroyed several years ago leaving nothing but a fading memory. However, some of the sailors and the crew members are still alive in the region. They were so young then but still, some of them can recall the memories and interesting stories of the ship Marion Kaplan sailed.
